The Absinthe drink was popular in Paris and was thought to be a form of self-medication for the working class, especially workers in the Parisian docks.

Edgar Degas’ paintings of dancers often do not typically depict on-stage performances. Instead, pieces like The Dance Class and In the Dance Studio are products of Degas’ drawings and sketches done in the dance studio while the dancers were practicing. He used the paintings as a means to explore the movement and expressions of the dancers. While some of his dancers appear to be frozen in time, others seem to be in motion, giving a sense of dynamism and energy to the paintings.
